REPORT OF THE BATTLES NOMENCLATURE COMMITTEE

1. We were appointed in May 1946 to tabulate and classify the actions fought in the second World War 1939–1945 with terms of reference as set out in Appendix A. Our report was approved by the Army Council and published in 1956.* In paragraph 21 of the report it was stated that the operations in the South Pacific and South West Pacific theatres 1942–1945, involving the forces of the Australian and New Zealand armies, were not included, and that the classifications of these operations would be published when they were complete. We have now carried out this task and the lists of classified operations of the 'Australian Campaign in the South West Pacific, 20th February 1942 to 22nd July 1945' and the 'New Zealand Campaign in the South Pacific, 7th August 1942 to 25th June 1944,' named and limited in time, are at Appendices D and E. The serial numbers of classifications are continued from our report published in 1956. A number of amendments to that report is at Appendix G.

2. In March 1956 we were instructed by the Army Council to make a similar report on the Korean operations 1950–1953. In carrying out this task we have used the same general principles where applicable as those in our earlier report. These are given in Appendix A. We have however, only dealt with those operations in which Commonwealth forces took part. A list of operations, named and limited in time, is at Appendix F.

3. We have relied for our documentary evidence on the Historical Section of the Cabinet Office who have been engaged in preparing a narrative of the Korean operations, in consultation with the officers concerned. (These officers are listed in Appendix B.)

4. Consultation with Commonwealth countries has been carried out through their representatives on the Committee. The composition of the Committee is given at Appendix C.

5. We have referred our reports to the Admiralty and the Air Ministry who have confirmed that the report is not inconsistent with corresponding proposals for sea and air operations.

RECOMMENDATION

6. We recommend that the operations shown in the tabulated list at Appendices D, E and F be classified, named and limited in time as set out in those Appendices.

On behalf of the Committee,

(Sgd.) H. FRANKLYN (General)

Chairman

APPENDIX A

TERMS OF REFERENCE

1. (a) to tabulate actions fought in the war (1939–45) which involved land forces of the British Empire;

(b) to classify these actions with a definite system of nomenclature which will denote their relative importance;

(c) to define the geographical and chronological limits of each action.

These terms of reference were expanded by the Army Council in March 1956, to include the Korean operations 1950–53.

GENERAL PRINCIPLES

Classification of operations

2. Our terms of reference required us to adopt a system of nomenclature which would denote the relative importance of the different operations during a campaign. We thought it desirable to keep the number of categories down to the minimum, so that the designations adopted and the distinctions between them could more easily become generally known and understood throughout the Army. We therefore decided to have only three general categories, to cover all types of specific operation worthy of separate mention in the classified list, namely (in order of importance), ' battle,' ' action ' and ' engagement.' To that extent we have followed the recommendations of the corresponding Committee of 1919–21, who classified under three categories—' battle,' ' action ' and ' miscellaneous incident,' but we have not necessarily adopted the definitions decided on by that Committee.

3. In some cases, the battle is a prolonged and wide-spread operation, including many nstances of more or less isolated fighting which, if considered separately, would merit inclusion in the classified list as separate actions or separate engagements. Many units or formations would like to consider as a battle honour the place-name which identifies them with this lesser operation, in which they perhaps took a predominant part. We therefore set out in the tabulated list at Appendices D, E and F (columns (d) and (e)) any actions or engagements which, although forming part of a battle are considered to merit consideration for battle honours. We do not consider that any corresponding sub-division of actions or engagements is necessary.

4. It will be appreciated that the tabulated list deals only with specific incidents: it does not necessarily cover all the incidental fighting during a campaign—for example, those small raids and incidents which form an integral part of any campaign.

5. We think that some provision must be made for troops taking part in the campaign who were not present at any of the battles, actions or engagements named in the list. Accordingly for battle honour purposes we have shown the title of the campaign or theatre which could be claimed as a ' battle honour.' Such a title is shown as a heading across the centre of the page at the beginning of the section containing the operations listed for that campaign or theatre.

Definition of Battle

6. The battle is essentially an operation of some magnitude. It is the most important single operation in a campaign and we have been particularly anxious to ensure that the designation is not given lightly, or applied to a series of disconnected and possibly lengthy operations, especially to those not directed to the same immediate object. On the other hand, some operations, not perhaps very extensive from the military point of view, assume an importance in relation to the general situation, or in the public eye, out of all proportion to their size and military significance. We found it impossible to arrive at any rigid definition.

Digitized by Google

We have been bound to consider each case strictly on its individual merits. The following are the points which we have taken into account in determining whether a particular operation, or connected series of operations, should be classified as a battle:

(i) size of force and degree of concentration, having regard to the time when the operation took place;

(ii) intensity of fighting;

(iii) duration;

(iv) strategical or tactical importance of results;

(v) relation of episode to size of campaign;

(vi) public sentiment and popular designation.

Definition of actions and engagements

7. Operations which are in the nature of battles, but of lesser importance or magnitude, have been classified as actions. In general, this classification denotes that the operation was of sufficient size and moment to require the use of substantial bodies of troops, and that considerable fighting was involved. As in the case of battles, however, the results of the operations and their importance in relation to the general situation at the time have been factors which we have taken into account.

8. We have regarded engagements as being essentially in a different category from either battles or actions. This classification indicates, as a general rule, particularly meritorious operations by units or small formations, sometimes representing independent contributions towards the general plan and at others isolated incidents deserving of special mention.

Nomenclature

9. We have borne the following points in mind when naming the individual operations. Firstly, it was felt desirable to include in the title some general indication of the object or result of the operation, e.g. 'defence of,' 'capture of' or 'withdrawal to.' This was particularly essential when two separate operations occurred at the same place, to distinguish the one from the other; it has the further advantage of providing the significant place name for an operation involving considerable movement. Secondly, there are some instances where separate operations occurred at the same place but which cannot be distinguished by any general indication as described above. In these cases we have differentiated the operations by adding the year after the title if the operations took place in different years, or by inserting 'I' and 'II' after the title if the operations took place in the same year.

10. In some cases, because of the lack of any identifiable geographical or other feature in the vicinity of the operation, we have had to resort to the descriptive or even fanciful name by which the locality was known by the troops who were there at the time.

11. We have also in a very few instances given alternative names to actions or engagements. We have done this as we found that in these particular instances, Commonwealth Countries whose forces had participated in the actions or engagements, identified the operation by the alternative name.

Spelling

12. We had intended to follow the spelling used in the official histories. As however our work was generally in advance of the historians, we agreed that we should take the advice of the Historical Section, Cabinet Office, and that our Committee, in agreement with the Commonwealth Countries concerned, should decide the form of the spelling to be adopted.

Chronological limits

13. We have made no attempt to define the time more closely that by the day (midnight to midnight). This was the course followed by the Committee dealing with The Great War (1914–18). In general, the limits shown indicate the period from the initial combat to the final combat in the particular operation described.

Geographical limits

14. Our terms of reference required us to define geographical limits. The delineation of geographical limits presents a major difficulty owing to the amount of movement during the course of many of the operations. In many instances it is impossible to fix limits by map reference. The geographical area may be extensive and there may be a danger, in view of the nature of the fighting, of excluding units or formations which took part in the operations or of including units or formations which had had no connection with the fighting forces employed. There is also the additional risk of including large numbers of troops passing through the area of fighting. In other cases, geographical limits are superfluous as all the troops in the neighbourhood were necessarily engaged and reference to a town, village or other topographical feature in the title is in any case adequate. We, therefore, believe from our examination of the problem that for most of the operations the delineation of geographical limits serves no really practical purpose, and might in fact, by their very inclusion, create difficulties. We came to the conclusion that instead of laying down geographical limits for the purpose of determining which units and formations took part in each operation, it would be more practicable to rely on the Order of Battle as recorded by the Historical Section of the country or countries concerned. Geographical limits have not therefore been included.
